“Fluency: Keeping the Other in Mind - and Finding Words to Really Connect” QUAD 170

ANNE GEARITY

Reflective practice aims to heighten our awareness of our own experiences, reactions and responses, to better allow us to be open to others' experiences, reactions and responses. But reflection cannot be enough: how do we foster the feeling of being understood, and build shared stories that facilitate our important work? In this talk, we will examine how we understand behavior and emotions, expand our appreciation of the deeply communicative intent of both, and construct fluency - ways of talking that assure genuine connection.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The Alliance, MACMH - IEC and CEED offer sincere appreciation for the partnering and financial sponsorship extended by the Center for Leadership Education in Maternal and Child Public Health, University of Minnesota.

CEED is deeply grateful to the Lynne & Andrew Redleaf Foundation for their generous contribution to CEED for the establishment of the Center for Reflective Practice. Through this support, the Center will enhance and deepen the science of reflective practice and promote its use in order to achieve positive outcomes for infants, young children and their families.
